Is she pregnant, injured, hiding out in Florida or vacationing in Colorado? Is she going to keep that hip new hairdo or trade it for the shaved Sinead O'Connor look?

These and other questions are being asked about Monica Seles, who is quickly becoming the Madonna of women's tennis.

From the grass courts of Wimbledon to the lush lawns of Palm Beach, Seles is getting Madonna-like treatment from the press and public. Every move she makes, every breath she takes is being scrutinized, analyzed and publicized around the world.

Ever since she pulled out of Wimbledon with a mysterious injury and dropped out of sight, Seles has been the subject of sensational speculation and rumors. The latest bombshell was dropped Monday by the New York Post, which claimed Seles and her parents were seeking solace at Donald Trump's palatial Palm Beach estate, Mar-A-Lago.

Trump, whose love life is chronicled almost daily in New York's tabloids, apparently has nothing but innocent intentions when it comes to the 17-year-old Seles.

"He just thinks Monica's a nice girl, and he admires her tennis skills," a source close to Trump told the Post.

Monica and Donald. It's a match made in gossip heaven.

The dynamic developer and the teen-age tennis titan apparently met at last year's U.S. Open and became fast friends. So when Seles needed a quiet getaway to escape the inquiring minds of the media, where better to go than Trump's 18-acre oceanfront estate in sunny South Florida?

"Why not? He's got plenty of room there," said Richard Johnson, gossip columnist for the New York Daily News. "The place has more than 100 rooms and most of them are empty. Maybe Trump will open up a boarding house for young women."

Through a spokeswoman, Trump declined to talk about Seles on Monday. But given his reputation as a publicity hound, Trump probably enjoys being linked to the world's top female tennis player.

"Publicity to Trump is like heroin to a heroin addict, and he's up to a $100-a-day habit," Johnson said.

Seles, on the other hand, seems to be sick of the suffocating attention she's been getting lately. Various reports have speculated that she is pregnant, suffering from shin splints and recovering from a minor car accident.

Johnson said the pregnancy rumor, published by Britain's largest tabloid, apparently was started by a group of Yugoslavian reporters at Wimbledon.

"They were sitting around trying to think of stories they could plant in the British papers, and they came up with the pregnancy thing," Johnson said. Peter Graf, father of Seles' rival Steffi Graf, recently was cleared in a paternity suit filed by a model who claimed she had an affair with him. Publicity about the case greatly disturbed Steffi Graf and contributed to her decline on the court, where she lost the No. 1 ranking to Seles in March.

Will Seles suffer a similar fate? Was her Wimbledon withdrawal — which ended her bid for a rare sweep of the four Grand Slam tournaments — the result of physical injury or emotional trauma?

By ducking the press and refusing to give a full explanation, Seles has kept the question alive.

"It's the most bizarre case in the history of tennis. The No. 1 player in the world has just vanished," said NBC's Bud Collins, who's been covering the sport for 36 years. "I don't know what's going on. I don't think anybody does except Monica and her family."
